Description:

Early map of Colorado, colored by counties, published by Rand McNally.

In the 1890s, Colorado was a young state with a thriving economy. The state's mining industry was still going strong, and many people came to Colorado in search of gold and other valuable minerals. The state's many mining towns, such as Denver, Central City, and Leadville, were hubs of activity and commerce.

Colorado also had a growing and thriving agricultural boom. The state's fertile soil and favorable climate made it an ideal place for farming, and many of the state's early settlers were able to make a good living from their farms.
