Description:

Rare and decorative large plan of the Peninsula of Macau, showing the beginnings of the significant man-made changes to the Portuguese colony.

This artistically virtuous map employs attractive pastel colors and a transitional Art Nouveau-Art Deco font to depict the Macau peninsula just before a series of massive land reclamation projects radically increased the size of the colony. When Macau was founded by the Portuguese in 1557, it was an island with a land area of only 1.1 square miles. Modest early landfill projects linked the island to the mainland and created more flat land for development. However, for the longest time the outline of the peninsula largely remained the same. The Portuguese added the islands of Taipa and Coloane to the colony in 1851 and 1864, respectively (located to the south, off of the map).

Porto De Macau -- Planta Geral Da Peninsula E Porto Interior De Macau Com A Indicacao Das Obras A Executar Na Area Abrangida Pela Planta . . .

The present map, which was issued around 1920, depicts the peninsula in its contemporary form (in beige), along with the proposed land reclamation projects (in pink) to the north around Ilha Verde and along the harbor bordering the Rio de Oeste, as well as on the eastern shore at the Praia Grande. These projects were eventually fulfilled, however, it was the project to create the quayside bordered by today's Avenida de Amizade that was the first project to be commenced, and which was finished by 1927.

Land reclamation projects on both the Macau peninsula and Taipa and Coloana continued for the rest of the century, and were dramatically accelerated from the 1970s onwards. For instance, in 1972, the area of the colony had grown to 5.8 square miles, and by 2010 had reached 8.2 square miles.

The map is therefore a rare and highly attractive final view of 'Old Macau' before its geography was revolutionized to accommodate dramatic growth.
