Description:

Extremely Rare and Impressive View of Santa Barbara. Only One Other Recorded Copy -- at the Santa Barbara Historical Society.

Rare lithographed view of Santa Barbara by "RH" and W.W. Elliott Lithography of San Francisco. According to Reps (389) there is only one institutional copy of the view, at the Santa Barbara Historical Society. There are no examples recorded in OCLC.

In one of the most beautiful valleys on the Pacific Coast, on a gentle slope, rising from the waters of the Pacific to a height of more than 300 feet to the venerable Franciscan Mission, is situated the far-famed city of Santa Barbara, the "little city by the sea." - Introduction below the image.

This view was prepared for S.W. Backus & Co, and was no doubt intended as a real estate promotional piece. It was published by The Santa Barbara Independent in 1877.

Relationship to other Early Views of Santa Barbara

Reps records a few other views of Santa Barbara published in the last quarter of the 19th century, however, this is the rarest early view; the 1873 "Santa Barbara, California" by A.E. Mathews and A.L. Bancroft & Co. is known in at least four institutional examples and features on three checklists; the 1877 E.S. Glover view "Bird's Eye of Santa Barbara, California, 1877. Looking North to the Santa Barbara Mountains" is in at least seven institutional collections and four checklists.

The timeline of these views makes sense given the history of Santa Barbara. While the city had existed in some form since Santa Barbara Presidio was founded in 1782, it was not until the Stearns Wharf was constructed in 1872 that the city saw its first real boom. Writer Charles Nordhoff was commissioned by the Southern Pacific Railroad to write about the city in the 1870s, and he further contributed to tourist interest in the area.

The final poem in the description of the view reads:

Where falls not hail... or any snow,

Nor ever wind blows loudly; but it lies

Deep in meadow'd, happy, fair, with orchard-lawns

And bowery hollows, crowned with summer-sea.
