Description:

An Interesting Part of U.P.R.R. Advertising and Mapmaking History.

It's Colorado Calling.

We have been able to locate a published version of this map that is part of the collection at Duke University. There are several notable differences between this preliminary mock-up and the printed version. For example, a radically changed version of the view is present, as is a changed version of the fisherman in the river. The map is much more detailed, with each of the states being labeled and much less emphasis being placed on the locomotive. In the printed version, a Union Pacific Streamliner, one of their newest engines, is placed closer to the viewer than one of the older steam locomotives. The print version of this ad was published in multiple different publications.
