Description:

Nice example of Bradford's map of the United States, focused on the earliest of America's Railroads and its then thriving system of canals for transportation of goods.

The map was printed at a moment in time where the Railroad system in America was still quite young and had not begun to overtake the canals in commercial importance. Over the next 30 years, the balance of trade importance would shift dramatically in favor of rail transit.

This is likely the first American atlas map to focus both Railroads and Canals.
