Description:

Detailed map designed to show the theater of war for the War of Jenkins's Ear.

The War of Jenkins Ear got its name from an event that occurred in 1731, when Robert Jenkins, the captain of the Rebecca, was captured in the West Indies by the Spanish. He claimed that his crew was mistreated, and that he was tortured, threatened with death, and his ear cut off.

At the time there was not much interest in his plight. However, later in the decade, the situation deteriorated between Spain and England. Spain objected to the English logging wood from their territory of Honduras, and the English were upset that the Spanish were limiting their access to the slave trade in the West Indies, access supposedly guaranteed by treaty. This friction was aggravated by a continuing dispute over the border between Spanish Florida and Georgia. In 1739, these issues were debated in Parliament and Jenkins's preserved ear was prominently exhibited, causing such a public uproar that Prime Minister Walpole was forced to declare war on Spain in October, 1739.

A classic example of Moll's fine engraving work. The map shows various sea routes, prevailing currents and other interesting features.

There is an earlier state of the map that does not include the reference to the war, nor the inset of Vera Cruz, nor many of the other annotations included in this state.
