Description:

A Colonial American Rarity - One of the Earliest English Maps of the Region

Rare early sea chart of the British and Spanish Colonies in North America, first published by John Seller in 1673.

Along with Morden & Berry's English Plantations in America, this is the first English map to focus on this region. Issued a year before the 1674 Treaty of Westminster ended the Dutch colonial presence in North America, the map's publication follows the Duke of York's being granted the control of the English Colonies north of the Delaware River (1664) and shortly before Charles II's grant to the Penn family of the lands which would become Pennsylvania in 1681, at a time when British interest and speculation in the region was about to explode.

Much of Seller's information was taken from a 1654 Spanish chart by Sebastian de Ruesta (Carta nautica del mar, costas islas de la Indias Occidentales . . .), which no longer exists, but survives to day in a Dutch copy from circa 1670, which currently resides in the British Library and was likely in British hands at the time Seller's map was engraved. As noted in Jackson, "[Sebastian de] Ruesta was a cosmographer and maker of mathematical instruments in the Casa de Contratacion; his brother Francisco was Pilot Major," giving Sebastian access to the best available maps in the Spanish archives and access to returning explorers. "Thus it is safe to say that his original "Carta nautica" drew upon the Casa's existing state of knowledge, although it is not known what sources he tapped." Jackson further opines that Ruesta likely drew on a second manuscript map "en cuarterones," a manuscript map which also resides in the British Library.

Seller also incorporated details in the Carolinas from John Lederer's 1672 map, while the lower half of the chart has been completed from other sources. This is one of the earliest to show the influence of the Lederer lake, desert and nomenclature in the Carolina region.

Among the more fascinating elements of the map is the use of the name "Watkins Point," which dominates the Del-Mar-Va peninsula. This was the name given by John Smith to a small point on the Peninsula opposite the mouth of the Potomac River on his map of 1612 and later used in the charter setting the boundary between Maryland and Virginia in 1632.

In describing the map, Burden notes:

The composition of this map was probably influenced by the Robert Morden and and William Berry English Plantations in America, 1673. Closer examination reveals that the nomenclature derives from other sources. The region of the south-east names Ashley Lake, which illustrate that Seller utilises the latest knowledge from John Ogilby's map A New Discription of Carolina, c. 1673, for his Lederer cartography.

Normally, a second state of Seller's map was instigated by the formation of the combine with four otehr partners in 1677. However, in this case he altered the Gulf coastline of North America and added a large number of new place toponyms. The origin for these is unclear and may havebeen a manuscript [source]. At the same time he re-engraved the sloppy title. As this state is much rarer, it is believed to have occured only just prior to the formation of the combine which created the third state. . . .

This is the third state of the map, as noted above by Burden. The additional place names added on the Gulf Coast and Florida include:

- Rio Diserta (Texas Coast)
- Rio de la Magdalena (Texas Coast)
- C de Montanas (looks like a spanish copy of the more Portuguese place name to its right -- C. de Montanha)
- R. de Spirito Sancto (Misissippi River)
