Description:

A decorative view of Amsterdam, showing fortified walls, windmills, buildings, and harbor, with over 100 ships at anchor along with barges on the Amstel. Drawn at the start of Amsterdam's Golden Age, the work portrays the city as a force to be reckoned with. The plan shows two coats of arms including the famous three St. Andrew's Crosses though on a red, not black background.

The map is shown from the perspective from present-day Amsterdam Noord, looking south. This creates an imposing and nearly symmetric plan of the city, focused on Amsterdam's harbor housing fleets of trade and warships. In the west (right of the image), Amsterdam extends to the edge of the outer ramparts and the Singelgracht canal. In the east, the city is slightly stunted and only reaches approximately to the Nieuwe Herengracht canal and inner ramparts, now overbuilt. Outer fortifications are shown extending around the city, though they would not be completed until 1660 when the Singelgracht was finished and Amsterdam grew into its famous crescent shape.

This map preserves an attractive view of 17th century Amsterdam as it was expanding to fill its position as a world power. The distinctive symmetry of the city, still visible in its modern layout, is beautifully presented.
