Description:

De L'Isle's Fine Map of Southern Africa

Striking example of De L'Isle's impressive map of South Africa and Madagascar, showing De L'Isle's characteristic precision and attention to detail. This edition was re-issued by Philippe Buache, De L'Isle's son-in-law.

Stretching from Congo in the north to what is now South Africa in the south, the map also includes Madagascar. The map is full of information about geographic features, especially lakes and rivers, natural resources, and indigenous peoples. Political boundaries are sketched, as are settled areas.

The map is based on De L'Isle's revised map of the continent of Africa, published in 1700. He shortened the width of the Mediterranean and northern Africa by twenty degrees as compared to Ptolemaic versions. In addition to his map of the entire continent, De L'Isle followed with three regional African maps: Northeast Africa, West Africa, and South Africa, which is this map, published initially in 1708.

Relevant to this map, De L'Isle reviewed existing evidence for features in the interior of Africa. He removed the lake system and Mountains of the Moon that stretched from southern Africa north; these were the traditional source of the Nile as described by Ptolemy. He retained a large lake in the region, however, here without name but "according to the report of the Africans."

Unlike on the southern part of the continent map, this map contains a large mountain range stretching from southwest to northeast. The note running along the range says, "Mountains of Lupata, called the
