Description:

Uncommon original antique map of the Gibraltar Peninsula, showing the peninsula under siege. The map shows the progress of the 1727 Spanish attack on the British-held peninsula and was published in Paris by the French engraver Guillaume Nicolas Delahaye in that year.

This highly decorated and detailed map shows Gibraltar in great detail, focusing on the lines of fire that English ships have on Spanish redoubts and the lines of fire that Spanish fortifications have on the British-held city. An extensive legend describes a number of places of interest through the map, and many annotations are made in the city, on the Rock, and at sea. Sailing ships and more appear at sea, with British fleets shown firing their canons.

Nouveau plan de Gibraltar: En l'Etat qu'il est presentement assiegeé par les Espagnols du 22 au 23 Fevrier 1727

Known as the Thirteenth Siege of Gibraltar, this siege was conducted by Spanish troops against the British city. The Spanish army and navy were particularly weak at this time, but Philip V decided to pursue the siege regardless as he viewed that the English had encroached too much on their promises made in the earlier Treaty of Utrecht. The siege was conducted from the Spanish-held mainland, which overlooked the town of Gibraltar. However, the superior British navy prevented any sort of blockade and quickly reinforced the garrison. Spanish troops withdrew after five months.

This map shows the siege in its earliest era, only two weeks in. The map cites the data shown as accurate to the 22nd and 23rd of February, and the siege had only started on the 11th.
