Description:

Fantastic Allegorical Temperance View Map Print

This rare allegorical temperance viewmap was created by Stedman Wright Hanks for the Massachusetts Temperance Alliance in 1863.

Created to illustrate the dangers of alcohol, the image provides a remarkable look at the journey from normalcy to damnation, riding the rail of the demon drink.

The American temperance movement used this type of robust allegorical image to illustrate and promote the idea that alcohol was a train ride to destruction, hence the "Black Valley Rail Road." Passengers embark in the sunny "region of churches and fountains". They proceed through a few stops suggesting moderate consumption (Medicineville, Tippleton) to Drunkards Curve, where "ambulances will be used." Thence the train is designated an "Express," with the route including Beggarstown, Gamblersville, Robbers Den, Prisonton, Demonland, Maniacville and finally, Destruction. "Accidents by collisions entirely avoided, as no up trains are run over the road."

In 1879, the father of the Black Valley Rail Road wrote that "more than three millions . . . have been called for, not including the altered forms of it surreptitiously published by the N. Y. Vinegar Bitters Co."

The Black Valley Railroad temperance lecture was one of the most impactful of the Temperance movement. Its imagery illustrating the descent into the perils of alcoholism via the drunkard's curve, the last stopping-place on the journey. In the saloon, with revelers in a "Licenced" car, drunken passengers arrayed below a man waiving a red flag and the devil feeding grains into the distillery fueling the train.

At the bottom left, some travellers are seen leaving the train and boarding the Free stage back to Temperance land, with a well dressed gentleman welcoming a young family. Another blue coated gentleman is helping the disabled and dying into an Ambulance, having been thrown out along the Track of the Road.

As noted on the Huntington Library / Jay Last Collection on-line description:

Image of a mock train schedule poster promoting temperance by warning of the effects of alcohol and smoking; train with "Alcohol" locomotive and bar car showing people drinking inside pulls away from "Drunkards Curve" station towards a dark area full of demons; horse-drawn ambulance vehicles pick up passengers who have disembarked; diagrams of a stomach lining in various states of decline due to alcohol consumption at bottom left and right; train stops at destinations "Sippington" through to "Destruction" at left and right of image. "New Eng. Lith. Co. 109 Summer St. Boston,"--text, bottom center margin. "National Temperance Society J.N. Stearns, Agent, 172 William St. New York."--text, bottom center margin. "Accidents by collisions entirely avoided, as only down-trains are run over the road. Tickets sold at all liquor shops. Look out for pickpockets while purchasing tickets. Key to the picture. In the background on the left, a train is starting..."

Context of American temperance movement in allegorical prints

The desire for self-improvement - material as well as moral - permeated American society in the mid-nineteenth century, encouraging reforms ranging from women's rights to the abolition of slavery. But it was the temperance movement that was widely promoted through the graphic arts... The fate of the drunkard was more directly and bluntly conveyed in the many prints published by engravers and lithographers after 1820. Most favored a sequence of images, reminiscent of Hogarth, to depict the tragic consequences of intemperance - American Allegorical Prints: Constructing an Identity, Yale Univeristy Art Gallery (1996), page 12.

States of the Print and Rarity

There are several variant states of the image, all of which seem to have been printed by the New England Steam Printing Company.
