(Republic of Texas Land Grants with Maps - Coahuila y Tejas) [Manuscript land grant documents issued by Radford Berry, alcalde of Nacogdoches, to John Adams and others, with manuscript plat maps by Arthur Hendrie and George Aldrich]

A group of original Spanish-language land grant documents issued in Nacogdoches, Texas, ca. 1836-1838. With plat maps drawn by two pioneering Texas surveyors, Arthur Henrie and George Aldrich.

Radford Berry was acting as "constitutional alcalde" of Nacogdoches at the time of these documents. In 1835 President Santa Anna had revoked the Mexican Constitution of 1824, abolishing all state governments. American settlers in Texas began to revolt against the Mexican central government in what would become known as the Texas Revolution. By April 1836, Texas had become the independent Republic of Texas.

The documents are as follows:

- Spanish language land grant issued in Nacogdoches, Nov. 6, 1837, with two-sheet manuscript plat map by surveyor Arthur Henrie, showing "Un Sitio de Tierra de la pertenencia del Ciudadano John Adams." With English-language certification by the Houston County clerk, docketed on verso of outer sheet: "Received for record, November 6th 1837, D. Lacey." 8 pages. Partial transcription:

Micheli acquired more than 24,000 acres from a member of the Bidais tribe in exchange for some clothing and trinkets). Docketed in English on verso: "Received for Record March 28th, 1838, R. Coahuila y Texas

Coahuila y Tejas was divided into several departments, each of which was governed by a political chief.

Departments were further subdivided into municipalities, which were governed by alcaldes, comparable to mayors. Each municipality also had an elected ayuntamiento, similar to a city council. Originally, all of Texas was included in the Department of Bexar, while Coahuila comprised several departments. After many protests from residents of Texas, in early 1834 the region was divided into three departments, Bexar, Brazos, and Nacogdoches.

The colony land offices in Texas were closed by the provisional government on November 13, 1835, which declared invalid any survey made after that date. The Texas Constitution of 1836 validated all Spanish and Mexican grants made in conformity with then standing laws.

The Fiscal Stamp of Coahuila and Texas

Three of the papel sellado leaves present here bear the handsome ink stamped seal of the Treasury of the State of Coahuila y Tejas - a very early and rare example of an official seal from Texas. The papel sellado was almost certainly stamped or printed locally, in the state capital of Monclova. Unlike the regular state seal for Coahuila y Tejas, which was essentially a slightly modified version of the Mexican national seal, the fiscal or treasury seal of Coahuila y Tejas is a unique design: the Mexican eagle's breast is surmounted with a large Eye of Providence within a pyramidal sunburst or halo. Two figures on either side of the eagle are almost definitely Native Americans, one with a bow and another with a quiver of arrows.

Plat Maps by Pioneer Texas Land Surveyor Arthur Henrie and George Aldrich

Arthur Henrie was the surveyor-general of David Gouverneur Burnet's colony, and engaged in land dealing in Texas for his own account.

The early era of pre-Republic surveying in Texas was truly a dangerous frontier endeavor. According to a fascinating article by Virginia H. Taylor Houston on early surveying in Texas, who includes George Aldrich in her list of early Texas surveyors:

It was nothing unusual for a surveyor to be killed by the Indians; often an entire party was murdered; and many expeditions started out never to be heard of again. Long since, the Indians had called the compass "the thing that steals the land."
