Description:

Charming Vernacular Manuscript Schoolbook

J. W. C. Evans, the Philadelphia boy who created this manuscript school book of Latin lessons, would go on to become a physician and amateur archaeologist. The carefully written manuscript contains lines in English and Latin, from some classical text.

In 1859 Dr. Evans discovered a wedge of sandstone with curious characters inscribed thereon. The piece came to light by a farmer plowing his fields in the northwest edge of Pine Barends, some fifteen miles from the Delaware River. Dr. Evans wrote to the American Ethnological Society, describing the stone, but a proper interpretation of the inscription was not made until years later. Dr. Barry Fell described the markings as Tartessian, in an Iberic language, which was used before the first century A.D., dating the wedge from about 200 B.C. to 100 B.C.

J.W.C. Evans was the son of Edward Evans, a noted early American plasterer, who did a ceiling medallion in Independence Hall, among many other important commissions in noted homes and buildings of Philadelphia. In 1813 and 1814, Evans styled himself a plasterer and a measurer of plasterer's work, with a shop located on the corner of 9th and Maple. In later directories, the elder Evans is described as a specialist in "ornamental stucco work."

(Early Philadelphia Juvenalia) [Manuscript Latin school exercises book by J. W. C. Evans, of Philadelphia, son of Edward Evans]

The cover image on the present book is noted herein as Pratt's Gardens near Philadelphia. The image shows some hand color in a juvenile hand, likely by the young Evans, who has also scribbled "Fire" above the mansion house, with illustrated flames. This image depicts Lemon Hill, Henry Pratt's Schuylkill River estate.
