Description:

The First English Atlas of the Entire British Isles.

A fine example of Speed's cornerstone Theatre of the Empire of Great Britaine, the most famous and quite possibly the most decorative atlas of Britain and Ireland ever published.

While the atlas is sometimes said to be cartographically derived from Saxton's 1579 Atlas of England and Wales, Speed in fact adds thousands of new towns and features as well as coverage of Scotland and Ireland. In addition, Speed's maps show his distinctive city views and plans, as well as a host of other decorative features to each of his maps. Most maps depict the county seats and one other city, and historical monuments engraved include Stonehenge, St. Paul's, and Henry VIII's famous Nonsuch palace.

Speed's Theatre includes two maps of the British Isles, as well as regional maps of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland. In addition, there are forty-four county maps of England, thirteen county maps of Wales, and four county maps of Ireland.

This is the 1646 edition of Speed's atlas (with a title page from the 1627 edition), which was first published in 1612 as an accompaniment to his History of Great Britaine (1611). The first map engraved for the atlas had been completed in 1604 (The County Palatine of Chester), although the death of the engraver William Rogers delayed publication. Jodocus Hondius, whose name is signed on many of the maps, took over and completed the project.
