Description:

A finely rendered, east-oriented map of the Kingdom of Naples. Published in Antwerp by Abraham Ortelius, it originally appeared in the seminal work "Theatrum Orbis Terrarum," widely recognized as the first modern world atlas. The map's coverage extends from the Tronto and Amaseno Rivers south to the Ionian Sea.

In the historical context, the late 16th century was a period of continued territorial contention and consolidation in Europe. Naples, as illustrated in this map, was under the rule of the Crown of Aragon. The verso text notably references Charles V, who recently reinforced the fortifications of Naples, a testament to the city's strategic importance in the Mediterranean.

The map marks out both modern regions such as Calabria, Apulia, Campania, and Latium, as well as the ancient territories of Picenum, Messapia, and Marrucini. This interweaving of ancient and contemporary designations provides a layered understanding of the area's history, reflecting the enduring influence of the past on the then-present geography.

The map's design draws heavily from the work of Pirro Ligorio, a well-known Italian architect, antiquarian, and archaeologist of the Renaissance period. His intricate detailing of the region provides an insightful account of the Neapolitan territory during a significant period of its history.
